The club consisted of thirty members. Their names were as follows: This is a striking list of early Kentucky names. Some of the men at that time were officially connected with public offices in the District of Kentucky, and nearly all of them afterward held important offices of trust and honor in the State and General Governments. Brief biographical sketches of these earnest-minded men can not fail to impress even those to whom their names are unfamiliar, with the excellent material of the club, and a mention of some of their descendants will show that the weight and high character of the members have been transmitted to subsequent generations. Not only were they conspicuous in shaping the beginnings of a commonwealth, they were the ancestors of a race which has taken a large part in guiding its career. It will not be necessary to speak of them in words of sounding praise, or describe at length their characteristics. Their names alone bring to mind the history of Kentucky. Mention of the positions of trust they filled tells the story of their merit. A few brief suggestions will suffice to show how permanently their work and influence were impressed upon the State. They were men who had passed through the training of the Revolution. The natural force that was in them had been developed in times that tried mens souls and ripened the faculties of men at an early age. The energy and enterprise...
