All the ivies thrive in peat soils; but there cannot be a question that, if fine examples of the variegated sorts are required, peat is to be avoided, and a mixture should be prepared consisting of turfy loam of a light texture with a considerable admixture of old mortar or plaster broken small, with siftings of broken brick and other such debris. In any and every case they must be treated as hardy plants, and have the fullest exposure to the weather. Hence, if pot specimens are grown for decorating the conservatories during the winter, they must be allowed to make all their growth in the open air in a partially-shaded spot, and be taken...
